

Old Grouch Jim Evans (William Sampson) has just sold half a million dollars' worth of stock for $250, but doesn't know it.

"Mile-a-Minute" Kendall (Tom Powers) runs afoul of the village justice (Burr McIntosh) and is fined on the spot for speeding.

Unhappy Amelia (Helen Lowell), called upon to set out luncheon for the speeder's party, helps herself to a piece of celery.

Oliver Morosco bids you smile a minute with "Mile-a-Minute Kendall."

Jack and Joan (pronounced "Jone") labor over Jack's invention, a crude oil engine for motor cars, which he perfects after being nursed back to health under her care.

Joan (Edithe Lyle), the little country girl, marvels at the beautiful hair of the city adventuress (Adele Blood). She has never seen anything quite like it in all of her peroxide-less young life.

The Judge carries the drink-stricken "Mile-a-Minute" upstairs to bed in the old roadside hotel, where he recovers, only to be dealt a knockout blow by sure-enough love.

The stockholders of the Mile-a-Minute Motor Company meet in the barn-garage to discuss the raising of funds for perfecting Jack's motor. Beatrice Noyes (as Beth, the reformed model) is the company's savior.
